Adventure was not an unexpected circumstance, sneaking up on unsuspecting innocents in the middle of the night: it was in fact a foregone conclusion. Even if Arrington Pentecost had not been born to be a hero, even if Algernon Vaudeville had not agreed to a foolhardy proposition, even if Jacob Damascus had not appeared on their doorstep, orphaned, frightened, and undeniably desperate: adventure would have found them. The appearance of a pretty girl in fear for her life only compounded it. Caught up in a whirlwind exploit of master criminals, steam powered technology, double crossing enemies, and triple crossing partners, Pentecost, Vaudeville, and young Damascus quickly find themselves careening from train robberies and daring rescues to a desperate search for answers to the secrets that had cost the lives of a mysterious group of vigilante heroes, slain in the dark of the night for defying an evil Consortium. The Adventure would have found them anyway: they just went out to meet it.
