The struggle was real. Agent Summers was about to die and the police officers who were present couldn't help her out of rubble. All they could do was try as much as possible to keep her alive right before the firemen came down. Thankfully, the firemen were on their way and the only thing that the injured police officers could do was to switch the main power supply and hope that the agent wasn't dead. They also make sure that they were throwing lots of water just to make sure that the raging fires weren't getting to where she was. The blast had taken everyone by surprise. A couple of police officers were injured. But thankfully, nobody had died.

Agent Cromwell arrived in the scene shortly after the blast and starts working immediately in a bid to save their lead agent. The firemen didn't seem to mind since they needed all the help that they could get in order to pull her out. "You aren't going to die on us Summers, do you hear me?" agent Cromwell yelled at her. But agent Summers didn't move an inch. She just stayed put, as though nothing was happening. Her heartbeat was slow and so was her breathing. It was such a traumatizing experience for everyone. She didn't move an inch, and blood came out of her nose as well as ears. This was a bad situation indeed.
